

STILL BURIED IN THE MINE

Rescuers Have Not Yet Reached the Men Entombed at Plymouth.

PLYMOUTH, Perm., Feb. 14.—The thirteen men who were entombed yesterday in the Gaylord mine by the caving in of the roof have not been reached by rescuers, and it cannot be said that much progress has been made in the effort to reach them. Whether any of them are alive is more than is known.

Workmen are now clearing out the old manway that runs alongside of the plane which is filled with culm. When this shall be cleared, searching squads will be able to enter the breast which divides the Gaylord from No. 5 of the Delaware and Hudson colliery. Other men are at work boring through pillars in the mine, with a hope of finding the men, but have made little headway. Some of the oldest miners shake their heads and say there is little chance of finding the men alive, if they shall be reached at all.

The searching party, which had been increased to 100 men, was obliged to quit work at 6 o'clock and hasten to the foot of the shaft, on account of more "squeezing" in that portion of the mine where they had been engaged.

The officials are very reticent, and have little to say, but it has been made known by some of the rescuing party that over fifteen acres of the inside workings of the Gaylord mine fell to-day and that more is likely to come down before morning.

The surface in the neighborhood of the disaster is beginning to crack, and seams can now be seen fully eight inches in width. The old workings of the Parish colliery, adjoining, are also showing signs of weakness, and a number of falls have occurred there since morning. The officials of the Delaware and Hudson Coal Company, which is mining coal near by, have taken every precaution to protect their portion of the mine, so that no accidents shall happen to them.
